Smooth, pale skin marked heavily by freckles and moles,
my mother calls them “beauty marks.”
Well, I must be beautiful because you can play connect the dots for miles across the landscape of my body.
A particular one, right next to my belly button, sits as a plot point on the map of my life.
It stands out in bold font, like the capital city—
the dot that marks the spot where my journey begins.

As a child, belly baby soft, ballet pink,
belly cradled in warmth,
my insides supple and open,
my body pushing the boundaries as all children do.
I heed my mother’s advice to “pull in my belly.”
I practice making the shapes of hills and valleys, concave and convex shapes in the mirror, shapes controlling how my insides tuck neatly into my ribcage
or burst out into space.
As others feed me compliments on my sleek torso,
I fill it with diet pills—supplementing an emptiness that extends to points beyond my middle.

but I am lean, embracing this journey to thin,

and I hold it all in tight.

I even add another landmark that punctures the terrain of my abdomen,

a silver rounded piercing,

a beacon that shimmers May through August, signaling days of half-shirts and a lemon yellow string bikini.

The landscape of my body glows with a luster—hot and exposed and like a cheap roadside attraction, it draws him in.

My eyes watching his eyes travel from north to south along the route of my torso.

My eyes waiting for his eyes to return north.

His eyes bound only southward, past my middle.

Without notice, my topography changes—

I feel the stretching of boundaries as my hands float over the vast expanse of this once familiar region.

My fingertips pressing in to feel a shift in direction.

The flat and solid transforms into the curves of hills so foreign to me,

of swollen breasts and thighs

of an ever-bloated, ever-rounded center.

This space, which was once only mine, I now share.

We grow; we expand together
and I simply give up holding and flexing.
I let go.

Exhale.

Belly soft and sagging like a deflated balloon, transforming into the perfect landing place to cradle her.
This flat-tire, pillow-like suppleness becomes only a momentary side trip as I cover that old, familiar territory that was once sucked in,
once tightly held together.
The roadmap of my torso shrinks back,
but the landscape is forever changed.
I carry these stretch marks both east and west of the middle,
like ripples in barren sand,
but my marriage,
my marriage I leave behind.

Hands full, baggage heavy, but faintly, in the distance plays a familiar song from my childhood each strum of his guitar vibrates across the country—
carrying me over miles of scars, over decades of this wilderness of flesh and bone,
over recognizable points on my map that I once thought were beyond reach
And this man, this song, touches me across borders and bridges—an intersection of voice and memories he navigates his way back to me.

We still see each other as children covered now in a vast network of scars and wrinkles.
He embraces my flawed torso
and whispers that he’s loved me since I was a child, asks if I will have his children
But en route to create our own our passage is blocked by cancer.

Here lies a tear in the map of our world
A melted, ridge of a scar inhabits the space between stretch marks east and west of the middle.

We cannot repair or rewrite this map or move highways so that our bodies can intersect sooner.
All that is left
is to simply embrace the peaks and valleys
of this place and each other.
The baggage is heavy
but we carry on without looking back.
